Keep children safe on the farm

ly here and for many farm families this is a busy time of the year. Parents need to take precautions to prevent their children from getting hurt on the farm.

According to the National Safety Council, approximately 300 people under the age of 19 die and approximately 24,000 people are seriously hurt on the nation's farms each year.

Debbie Richardson, Oklahoma State University Cooperative Extension parenting assistant specialist, said while parents can teach children about farm safety, they also need to provide a safe environment.

"Parents are anxious for their children to start helping around the farm," Richardson said. "Young children's ability to reason and use logic is immature and they can't apply what is learned in one situation to another situation. They are often overconfident and will do things beyond their abilities to imitate or please adults."

Although it is not completely possible to childstrive to make it as safe as possible.

Richardson said the key to a child's health and well being is for parents to provide appropriate supervi-

"Toddlers should never be left alone and must be supervised at all times," she said. "Even six-year-old children should be monitored from a close distance and checked on every 10 to 15 minutes."

The NSC's Agricultural Division encourages parents to not allow children to roam freely on the farm and design a safe play area near the house and away from work

They also recommend the following tips to injury prevention on the farm.

Inspect your farm on a regular basis for hazards that can injure children wondering on the farm. Correct these hazards immediately.

Children who are physically able to be involved in farm work should be assigned age-appropriate tasks and continually trained to also be constantly supervised.

Equip all barns, farm shops, chemical storage areas and livestock pens with latches that can be locked or secured so children cannot enter.

Always turn off equipment, lower hydraulics and remove the key before leaving equipment unattended.

Do not expose children to hazards. Never carry them on tractors and equipment or invite them into the farm shop, livestock barns, grain bins, etc.

"It's also important to remember prevention includes preparation. Let your children know what to do in case of an emergency," Richardson said. "The best safeguard against farm injuries is for parents to understand their children's development and provide a safe place for them."

OSHA probes deadly Kansas elevator collapse

TOPEKA - (AP) The site of a grain elevator collapse that killed two workers in central Kansas was inspected Friday by federal safety officials, though authorities have not determined what caused the accident.

Two grain bins collapsed Thursday at the Agco Inc. elevator in Russell while workers were unloading a truck. The accident killed Max Greve, 21, of Hays, and Sean Banks, 19, of Russell. Both were buried by grain when the elevator gave way.

Investigators from the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration were gathering information at the site Friday. OSHA's area director, Judy Freeman, said an initial check of records turned up no complaints or previous accidents at the elevator.

The elevator is located on the north side of Russell, a community of 4,200 people along Interstate 70 about 180 miles west of Topeka.

The bodies of Greve, a Fort Hays State University student from Nebraska, and Banks, a freshman outfielder for the Hutchinson Community College baseball team, were recovered shortly before 5 p.m. Thursday.

Dan Bernard, general manager of Agco, issued a statement calling the deaths "a terrible incident."

"This incident is a tragic loss, and on behalf of the board of directors, management and fellow employees, we extend our sincerest sympathy and heartfelt condolences to the Greve and Banks' families," Bernard said.

The Kansas Department of Agriculture is required to inspect the company's financial records to verify compliance with Kansas grain storage laws, but isn't required to inspect grain elevators for safety violations, department spokeswoman Lisa Taylor said.

But inspectors do go inside the facilities as part of their duties, she said.

"If they see something, like a loose railing, they will point it out as a courtesy," Taylor said.

Schwieterman Market Outlook

A marketing commentary by Bret Crotts

Wednesday is the June acreage report. There are those who believe that corn acreage will be higher because the planting pace was so fast and farmers just kept planting, and there are those who believe that corn acreage will be lower because wet weather/flooding caused replanting to soybeans or abandonment. The average trade guess calls for 89.3 million acres, which is up half a million. It's a tough call and I think the June number will likely be close to unchanged from the March Planting Intentions report.

If acreage is up 1 million, it will be a little bit negative, but an increase in the export estimate in the July supply and demand report would offset much of the production increase. A cut in acreage would be pretty friendly and put even more focus on the weather. For the soybeans it is even more confusing.

The range of estimates runs from 76.5 to 79.6 million, with an average of 78.3, which compares to 78.1 in the March report. The range is wide, but the average comes in near unchanged. Nobody has any idea what USDA will come up with. It is hard to prepare for a report like that, other than owning put options, but hoping it is a friendly report.

3500 South 9th

The corn posted an outside day down on Monday and followed that up with four more lower highs and lower lows. Multiple levels of support failed and the charts suggest the December contract is headed for a test of the June low, which it at the $3.54 level. For the week the December contract lost 20 cents.

Demand is still good, with export sales coming in at 1.12 MMT of old crop sales. The current pace suggests USDA is too low in their export estimate by at least 50, and possibly 100 million bushels. There are still 9 weeks left in the crop year, so there is still plenty to time to make more large sales.

Crop condition ratings were down 2 points to 75% Good to Excellent. I thought that the corn market would certainly be doomed if condition ratings were higher, but I thought there would be more doubts about record yields if the ratings were down. Apparently it will take more than just one week down and more than just 2 points down to get traders to think twice about the high yields. Condition ratings are expected to be lower again on Monday, but just a small drop once again.

The wheat had a nice run higher. There wasn't any reason for it, and that seemed to catch up with the market on Friday. For the week, the July KW was down 13 ½ cents, most of which came on Friday.

Basis improved a little bit last week, but it is still terrible. The delivery period against the July contract begins this week, so it will be very interesting to see if anyone takes advantage of the wide basis at the delivery points. Export sales were good for the second week in a row, which is encouraging. If sales can remain this strong for a month, USDA will have to consider raising the export estimate. However, it will take several months of good sales in order to have a real impact on our ending stocks. It is likely that we will see some benefit from the acreage problems in Canada, but it will take a long time to find out the real impact.

The July soybeans stalled out last week and turned lower. Weakness in the stock market and crude oil were the main negative factors, while old crop demand was supportive. For the week, the July soybeans lost 4 cents and the November fell 18 1/2.

The bull spreads worked well for the same old reasons. Old crop demand is still good and new crop supplies will be much more plentiful. If the acreage report comes in on the negative side of expectations, the bull spreads will have a great week.

Export sales came in at 308,300 MT for the old crop and 233,000 MT for the new crop. Soybean oil sales were over 45,000 MT. The Chinese have been huge buyers of soybean oil this month. Although bean sales have slowed, it is still possible that USDA will have to raise the export estimate again.

The August feeder cattle gained over $3 last week and are back above the 50-day moving average. The market is becoming overbought, but at this point it looks like setbacks are buying opportunities. The live cattle were firmer as well. The August LC gained over $1 and it looks like that contract has bottomed. The fundamental outlook is good, so if the stock market makes a recovery next week, the live cattle will post solid gains.

In dealing with non-family employees on a family farm or ranch, here are some points to consider in hiring and keeping the kinds of employees that are reliable and motivated.

Hire well: This is your key factor. Do this well and the rest of the relationship will fall into place. Do this poorly and your headaches will grow with time.

Look for people who are flexible, listen well and can take directions. People who are set in their ways don't like working for somebody else. The best employees will take pains to find out what the owners want and will work for them.

Check out their philosophy about the handling of livestock and machinery beforehand. Get to know their goals. Learn about their ability to take responsibility and their attitude about work. You don't want somebody who is lazy or irresponsible.

It may take some trial and error before you know how well things are going to work out. In farm situations, even the smallest differences tend to get put under a magnifying glass.

Things go best when people think alike. Owner/ operators should know themselves and the things they are particular about so they will know who to hire and who to avoid. This is especially true if a farm owner is a poor communicator and expects the hired person to automatically "know" what he or she wants.

Involve the spouse: If you are dealing with a couple, get to know the spouse as well. If your hired employee is male, then it is extremely helpful if his wife has a farm background and understands the routine of a farm. If she's not happy, he's not happy.

Find out what she wants to do, if anything, on the farm and involve her to the extent you can. Issue a separate check for her contribu-

Communicate openly: Communication is one of the main keys to working out a good relationship. A lot of problems come up when an owner is unassertive and doesn't communicate feelings. At the same time, the employee may be equally unassertive and not bring up problems or voice his or her complaints.

Schedule regular meetings: A meeting can be a planned coffee time to talk about the goals for the day or for the week. It gets everybody pointed in the same direction. Everyone should feel free to bring up problems, to suggest improvements or to talk about an easier way of doing things. Good management gets everyone's ideas out on the table.

Humor is always a good way to make criticisms without being too direct. It keeps the atmosphere relaxed. People can get messages about where improvement is needed without feeling like they are being singled out.

Don't be too critical: A temper is a big liability for dealing with hired help. Nobody likes being chewed out. The quickest way to get rid of an employee is to give him a steady diet of criticism and negative comments.

One owner, when he had trouble "selling" an idea to his hired man, would take him to an Extension program and let someone else do the teaching. That extra patience paid off and his employee eventually came around to his point of view. The new idea became his idea too.

The things an owner is fussy about, he or she should do himself and delegate the things that need to be done right, not "just" right. If wire needs to be twisted a certain way, the owner should do it rather than micro-managing how it should be done.

Allow for personal growth: Being allowed to contribute ideas is often a crucial factor on whether employees stay or go. The people you employ need to feel competent and good about themselves. Delegate a complete area of responsibility with lots of latitude for decision-making and the way results are accomplished.

Employees need a chance to be creative and try out their own ideas. See to it that their own "signature" is on a lot of things that happen on a farm and give them ample recognition for their work.

Beef exports strong

While economic condi- 58%, respectively, over last tions remain difficult for U.S. beef in Mexico, exports are thriving in all other key year, Mexico remains the No. 1 market in terms of both volume (77,027 metric tons or 169.8 million pounds (lb.) and value ($246.9 million) but these totals are down by 25% and 27%, respectively, compared to the first four months of 2009.

Despite dramatic gains in many overseas markets, Canada remains the No. 2 destination for U.S. beef. Beef/beef variety meat exports to Canada are up 13% in volume (45,563 metric tons or 100.5 million lb.) and 17% in value ($199.4 million) compared to January-April 2009. In fact, April export value to Canada ($59.9 million) pulled within just 4% of Mexico ($62.2 million).

Japan is the leading Asian market in 2010 in terms of both volume (26,740 metric tons or 58.9 million lb.) and value ($141.8 million). Each of these totals represents an increase of 34% more than January-April 2009 figures. South Korea is right on Japan's heels, with a volume of 26,321 metric tons (58 million lb.) valued at $112.3 million — increases of 39% and

The ASEAN (Assn. of Southeast Asian Nations) global markets. For the region also performed very well in April, pushing its totals for the year up by 14% in volume (29,589 metric tons or 65.2 million lb.) and 16% in value ($97.9 million). Interestingly, this increase was achieved despite fairly flat results in Vietnam — by far the largest ASEAN market. The primary growth drivers were the Philippines and Indonesia, the No. 2 and No. 3 markets in the region.

Russia has also expanded its purchases of U.S. beef to include a much higher percentage of muscle cuts, and this was illustrated clearly in the January-April results. Exports toRussia were up 173% in volume (19,525 metric tons or 43 million lb.) but an even more remarkable 613% in value ($47.5 million) compared to 2009.

In contrast to the downturn in Mexico, exports are performing very well in other Western Hemisphere markets. Beef/beef variety meat exports to the Dominican Republic were up more than 60% in volume and value, while Jamaica was up more than 30%.

Pruning and staking improves tomato crops

Pruning and staking tomato plants helps keep the fruit off the ground, protect fruit from sunburn, and get a decent crop, said a University of Illinois Extension horticulture educator.

"Staking and pruning also exposes leaves to full sun and reduces competition between suckers and the developing fruit," said Maurice Ogutu. "Tomatoes can be supported by stakes, cages or trellises. The type of support depends on the tomato growth

"Tomatoes are divided into two different types — determinate and indeterminate varieties — based on their growth habits.'

The determinate varieties have short to medium length vines. Plants are heavily branched and growth stops when they start flowering. Every branch tends to end up with a flower cluster. The determinate varieties can be staked or caged, but not trellised. Determinate varieties are not heavily pruned as most of the fruit is produced on the branches.

Ogutu said the indeterminate varieties continue to grow and produce leaves and flowers until the first frost. They are heavily pruned when trellised, moderately pruned when staked, and lightly pruned when caged. Some of the indeterminate varieties are Better Boy, Big Beef, Big Pink, Brandy Boy, Brandywine, and Flo-

"Pruning is the removal of small shoots that join the stem," he said. "This reduces competition between the suckers and the fruit. Pruned plants produce larger and earlier fruit as most of the plant energy is channeled into the fruit."

Remove the shoots when they are four inches long, as removal of larger suckers may injure the plant.

Remove a sucker by grasping it between your thumb and second finger and bending it to the side until it breaks. It is advisable to do this early in the day when the plant is still crisp. Do not cut suckers with a knife, as this can lead to the spread of diseases. Limit the branches of indeterminate varieties to two or three fruit-producing branches by selecting the main stem sucker that develops immediately below the first flower cluster, and another sucker below that. Remove all other suckers, and periodically remove additional suckers that develop on the selected branches.

"For staking, it's important to decide on the type of support before setting plants in the garden," Ogutu noted. "Plants that are supported using trellises are set closer than plants to be staked or caged. Plants to be caged are set further apart than plants to be staked.

Staking tomato plants requires metal or wooden stakes. The wooden stakes need to be at least one inch square. Sections of concrete reinforcing rods can also be used as stakes. Determinate varieties require stakes that are three to four feet long and indeterminate varieties require stakes that are five to six feet long. "Do not use chemically treated wood," he added.

The plants should be spaced about two feet apart within the row. Place the stake next to each plant or every other plant three to four inches away the base of the plant. Avoid the side where the first flower clusters appear. Tie individual branches to the stake with a polyethylene cord or sisal twine by looping it loosely around the plant. Continue to prune and tie the plant as it grows. Do not tie the plant below the flower clusters. When staking determinate varieties, remove the first suckers only.

To cage tomato plants, use wire cages made from concrete reinforcing wire. Make cages of about 18 inch diameter with openings that can allow hands to go through (about six-inch openings) when picking fruits. Indeterminate varieties require taller cages that are about five feet tall and determinate types need shorter cages about two to three feet tall. Plants are pruned to four to five fruiting branches. Turn the ends of the branches back into the cage.

For trellising, posts should be anchored in the ground about 20 feet apart and about six feet above the soil surface.

"Stretch a piece of barbed wire between the tops of the posts," he said. "Attach a length of twine to the wire above each plant. Tie the twine to the base of each plant and wrap plants around the twine as they grow or tie them with plastic clips. Use a separate cord for each stem when trellising two stems per plant.'

Look To Bag That Worm

The Manhattan Area Garden Tour is Saturday, July 10. You can bet the hosts are scouting for any problems that will interfere with the health of their plants.

While too much rain is hard to control, bagworms are easier to stop. Bagworms feed on just about any plant but seem to favor the evergreens.

I suggest looking over your spruce, arborvitae, and junipers which includes the eastern redcedars for small wiggling bagworms. The ones I've seen are already a half inch long. It seems they have been growing like the weeds this year.

Hand removal is an option although it could become a tedious task. There are lots of products labeled for control of bagworms. Bagworms are susceptible to these products, especially when the bagworms are young. Control with an insecticide later in the season becomes much more diffi-

Two organic active ingredients that could be used are neem oil or the bacteria Bacillus thuringiensis. Other active ingredient possibilities include acephate, bifenthrin, carbaryl, cyfluthrin, deltamethrin, lambda-cyhalothrin, malathion, permethrin or spinosid.

More importantly than which product to use, is the application process. Thorough spray coverage is necessary to reduce bagworm populations. Hand pressure sprayers typically don't penetrate dense foliage of junipers. They are good at treating the peripheries of the plants.

Bagworms often feed deep in the plant. Powered sprayers or hose end type of equipment are better at treating the whole infected plant.

Tall trees may require a commercial applicator to get complete coverage. A resistant plant to bagworms could be good for your landscape. The only plant that I ran across claiming this is the 'Green Giant' arborvitae. It was not a researched claim so I'm cautious about its ability. The bagworm preferred plants add interest to the landscape. Evergreens are of particular interest in the winter. I still suggest using them in the landscape. There aren't any guarantees when working with nature.

Young deer potential source of chronic wasting disease

Last September, Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks staff learned that a white-tailed fawn had been transported from Decatur County in northwest Kansas to the Hutchinson Zoo. Because deer from Decatur County have tested positive for chronic wasting disease (CWD), KDWP biologists had to work with zoo officials to euthanize and test the animal for the disease. This is another case of wellmeaning people trying to "rescue" apparently abandoned animals only leading to the animal's demise.

Fortunately, the sample in this case came back negative for CWD, but it could have been a disaster had it not. Chronic wasting disease (CWD) is a contagious neurological disease affecting deer and elk. It causes a characteristic sponge-like degeneration of the brains of infected animals, resulting in emaciation, abnormal behavior, loss of bodily functions, and death. It is always fatal.

But the greatest danger in transporting these animals is that it will likely accelerate the spread of the disease to their new environment for a very long time. Attempts to decontaminate infected facilities have failed. For example, 20 years after captive mule deer were removed from an infected facility in Colorado, deer were returned to pens in the same spot and soon contracted CWD.

To prevent spreading CWD to wild deer in other parts of Kansas and to avoid contaminating facilities, KDWP has asked licensed wildlife rehabilitators to discontinue rehabilitating any orphaned or injured fawns. While some states have or will be making fawn rehabilitation illegal, KDWP is currently asking rehabilitators to cooperate voluntarily.

We encourage the public to leave fawns in the wild," said Shane Hesting, wildlife disease coordinator for KDWP. "As we all know, in many cases, lone fawns are seldom 'orphaned'. The mother is usually nearby but out of sight, keeping watch. The risk of spreading such a dangerous disease should override the emotion of wanting to 'save' a fawn.

Wildlife officials are concerned about CWD's potential impact on wild deer and elk populations. CWD was first identified as a clinical disease in captive mule deer in Colorado in 1967. It has since been detected in wild deer in 14 states, including Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, and Nebraska. KDWP has been monitoring deer in Kansas since 1996 and first detected CWD in samples from wild deer in 2001. This past year, 11 deer were confirmed positive and four are currently presumptive positive, all from northwest Kansas.

Besides leaving young deer (and other animals) alone, anyone who sees a deer acting sick should immediately contact the nearest KDWP office or their local sheriff.

Cattle Reproduction Specialist

Many ranchers choose to breed the replacement heifers about a month ahead of the mature cows in the herd. In addition, they like to use a shortened 45 to 60-day breeding season for the replacement heifers. The next logical step is to determine which of these heifers failed to conceive in their first breeding season. This is more important today than ever before.

As the bulls are being removed from the replacement heifers, this would be an ideal time to call and make arrangements with your local veterinarian to have those heifers evaluated for pregnancy in about 60 days. In two months, experienced palpaters should have no difficulty identifying which heifers are pregnant and which heifers are not pregnant (open). Those heifers that are determined to be "open" after this breeding season, should be strong candidates for culling. Culling these heifers immediately after pregnancy checking serves three very economically valuable pur-move sub-fertile females from the herd.

Lifetime cow studies from Montana indicated that properly developed heifers that were exposed to fertile bulls, but DID NOT become pregnant were often sub-fertile compared to the heifers that did conceive. In fact, when the heifers that failed to breed in the first breeding season were followed throughout their lifetimes, they averaged a 55% yearly calf crop. Despite the fact that reproduction is not a highly heritable trait, it also makes sense to remove this genetic material from the herd so as to not proliferate females that are difficult to get bred.

Culling open heifers early will reduce summer forage and winter costs. If the rancher waits until next spring to find out which heifers do not calve, the pasture use and winter feed expense will still be lost and there will be no calf to eventually help pay the bills. This is money that can better be spent in properly feeding cows that are pregnant and will be producing a salable product the following fall.

Identifying the open would only sell for about $700 next spring.

The average expense for owning the cow is about $1 per day. So the total loss of keeping the open heifer would be about $200 in feed and forage and another $91 in lost value. The grand total expense for not culling open replacement heifers in today's market is about $291 per head. Therefore, it is imperative to send open cull heifers to the feedlot while they are young enough to be fed for 4 to 5 months and not be near the "B" maturity age

Certainly the percentage of open heifers will vary from ranch to ranch. Do not be concerned, if after a good heifer development program and adequate breeding season, that you find that 10% of the heifers still are not bred. These are the very heifers that you want to identify early and remove from the herd. It just makes good economic business sense to identify and cull non-pregnant replacement heifers as soon as possible.

The Fly

Have you ever noticed how a horse or cow can shiver their skin to get rid of a fly that lands on them? It's amazing how they can make a portion of their skin vibrate in the area a bug has landed. How do they feel something so tiny through their thick hide? I've often wondered at the sensitivity of an animal's skin to be able to detect such a light creature landing on them. We can feel those tiny insects landing on our skin too. It's irritating when a fly lands on us but we react a little differently than an animal does. What usually happens when we feel one set down on our skin is we take a good slap at the spot where we think it has landed. In the process we generally miss the fly and cause ourselves more pain from the slap than the fly would have caused.

God gave the animals a more sophisticated defense system than he bestowed on humans. We can't shiver our skin to chase them off and we don't have that long, hairy, flyswatter of a tail that he gave horses and cows. So, when we feel a fly or mosquito land, we take a slap at it with our hand, hat, or whatever is handy.

Those pesky little boogers can teach us something. Don't try this on a cow because you may get kicked. Broke horses are a little more tolerable of our shenanigans, so use one of them. Next time you have your horse tied up, try barely touching his skin with the tip of your finger and see what happens. Barely touch him and see if his skin doesn't shiver like it does when a fly lands on him. If he's alive, his skin will begin fly flickering and jiggle up and down in the area you touched. Now, try it again in his girth where you usually poke him with your spur. His skin jiggles again because he can feel that light touch you have placed there. If you've got nothing better to do and the cows don't need milking, take the time to go around his body lightly touching him in the areas you usually cue him with your spurs, legs or heels. See what I mean? He feels that light touch every time.

Think about the fly the next time you work with your horses. It doesn't matter whether they're young colts or older horses that haven't learned the light touch and are a little tough to respond to your cues. They feel your every touch to their skin whether it's with spurs or your legs. You can make a better horse if you think about the fly during your training regimen and how sensitive a horse's skin is. Take it one step further and think about your verbal commands. Horses have good ears too. They probably hear a lot better than we do. They live in a natural environment so most don't have to listen to the noise pollution humans are subjected to, like horns honking and machinery screaming in our ears. Those civilization noises dull our hearing. That's why we're always saying "huh?" and the hearing-aid people are rich enough to spend the winter in Florida.

You don't have to shout to make your horse understand you. Say "whoa" softly and I'll bet you'll get a better result than when you

My wife is always telling me that I don't have to shout when I talk to her. She doesn't understand that she's not the same as a sensitive horse. I get her attention pronto if I raise the decibel level. What's more, I can't startle her like I can a horse. What is your first reaction when surprised by a loud shout? Treat your cues the same way. Do them softly and see what happens. If nothing happens, bump him a little harder. Next time speak softly again and cue lightly.

World Champion trainer Jack Hennig says, "If they never feel soft, they'll never know soft." Don't do it too lightly because you may get swished with a fly swatter. You'll know your cueing is too light if your horse keeps swishing at you with his tail. Remember how sensitive his skin is and only use enough pressure to get the movement you want.

Once you start getting satisfactory results, try using even less pressure. Softness takes work and patience. Work on it a little each time you ride your horse. Pretty soon you'll find yourself having to work less to get better control. When it starts working for you, it's a win-win situation. Your horse is more comfortable with less pressure and you're more relaxed in the saddle. You can concentrate more on the job at hand rather than spurring and pulling on the reins.

And don't worry about using too much fly spray. It will keep the flies away but won't stop your horse from feeling your light touch.
