

Schwieterman Market Outlook

A marketing commentary by Bret Crotts

The grain markets had a rough week. The corn and Kansas City wheat fell to new contract lows, while the soybeans dropped to the lowest level since June 30th. Demand has been very good for the corn, wheat, and soybeans, but traders are much more concerned with the threat of higher corn and soybean production in the August supply and demand report. Expectations are for higher old crop and new crop corn ending stocks and the possibility of new crop ending stocks moving back over 3 billion bushels.

that the stocks-to-use ratio will not be the worst since the late 1980s. New crop soybean ending stocks are expected to be back over 500 million bushels, which is still under the old crop, but just a short time ago it looked like we had the possibility of moving under 300 million.

The wheat numbers are probably not going to move the markets much. Ending stock will most likely be unchanged, which at least isn't more bearish. It also, of course, is bullish, but at some point the good demand numbers we have been seeing will get the USDA to increase the export estimate and cut ending stocks. We just haven't quite seen good exports for long enough for USDA to make a move.

The Chinese have been active buyers of many of our ag products, and although they are nowhere near the "Phase 1" commitment, they are at least having a positive impact on the market. Without their business, the export estimates, and prices, would be lower than they already are.

We don't have much bullish news to discuss, and besides the exports to China, the main bullish force in the market is the declining dollar. The September Dollar Index fell to a new contract low, which was also a new twoyear low, last Thursday. The falling dollar will help to keep us competitive on the world market, which is exactly what we need. The falling dollar is also helping the gold reach new all-time highs and attracting foreign investors to our stock and bond markets. We need some of that money flow to head into agriculture, but we don't have a bullish story for investors to grab ahold of.

The cattle market is a little bit bullish, and the market has been trending higher for a few months. All the cattle contracts either made new multimonth or new contract highs. Unfortunately there were also a lot of reversals lower from those highs on Thursday. The chart formation, along with the tendency to decline at Grass & Grain. August 11, 2020 this time of year, make me nervous. Chances are high that we will see a sizeable correction in the short run. Hedging at these levels is wise and a move below the 50-day moving average would be an indication that it is time to add to short positions.

There is almost no chance Beef demand macroecono

Oklahoma State University The U.S. economy was wracked like never before in the first half of the year. The Bureau of Economic Analysis (BEA) released preliminary estimates showing that U.S. Gross Domestic Product (GDP) declined by an unprecedented 32.9 percent year-over-year in the secfollows a five percent first quarter decrease compared to last year. This highlights questions about the impact of the pandemic on beef demand in the first half of the year and, more importantly, beef demand for the remainder of the vear.

The first half of 2020 was a confusing mix of dynamics, complicated by dramatic disruption of beef supply chains. Overall beef demand was difficult to judge accurately as surging retail grocery demand was offset by sharply diminished food service demand and all obscured by temporary supply shortages that reduced overall beef availability.

Record overall wholesale and retail beef prices masked a variety of impacts in various beef product markets related to the type of demand for the product and the ability to shift product from food service to retail grocery supply chains.

Beef supply conditions have stabilized, albeit at higher levels of production year over year in the second half of 2020. Beef demand will be critical in determining overall beef prices and, subsequently, cattle prices going forward. Beef demand, as for any product, is generally a function of consumers' willingness and ability to purchase specific quantities of the product at various prices of the product.

Willingness to purchase beef consists of a couple of components. Underlying consumer preferences determine overall demand for beef. Tastes and preferences tend to be relatively stable, evolving over longer periods and generally appear strong, i.e. beef is popular. In the short run, willingness to purchase beef will depend on the relative prices of other products, particularly substitute products that may be consumed in place of a particular product.

For specific beef products, this is a complicated consideration, including pork and poultry, as well as the multitude of other beef products that may be chosen by consumers. In periods of low income, beef consumers may "trade down" from high cost beef products to lower valued products. Food service demand, which remains diminished, will emphasize this impact going forward.

Ability to purchase a product is related to the level of consumers' discretionary income. Consumers must have income to purchase a product regardless of how much they desire the product. Generally, macroeconomic conditions including overall GDP levels along with unemployment are indicative of income levels.

The U.S. economy is in recession and will be for the balance of the vear and likely into next year.

at 14.7 percent in April before declining to 11.1 percent in June. Unemployment is expected to decline but will remain elevated in the second half of the year. GDP is projected to be lower for the remainder of the year with annual estimates down in a range of 6.5 to 8.0 percent year over year.

In the first half of the year, the dramatic drop in GDP and increase in unemployment did not correspond directly to similar beef demand impacts because federal stimulus and unemployment benefits partially offset direct negative economic impacts on consumers. Macroeconomic conditions as well as the status of economic support will play a key role in overall beef demand going forward.

Time approaching to make decisions on fungicide application for soybeans

By David G. Hallauer, Meadowlark District Extension agent, crops & soils/horticulture

If they haven't already, soybeans will soon reach the growth stage that is 'decision time' for a fungicide application. Growth stage R3 is known as beginning pod. At this stage, pods are 3/16" long on one of the four uppermost nodes of the main stem with a fully developed leaf. It's at this time that we start trying to answer the question: Do I need to spray my soybeans with a foliar fungicide? It's a great question that will require some scouting.

Sovbean diseases that might warrant fungicide control include frogeye leaf spot, brown spot, Cercospora leaf blight and pod and stem blight. Brown spot can be common in Kansas with Cercospora and pod and stem blight an issue in excessively wet years.

Scouting for these diseases now is important for a couple of reasons. First, there are diseases that may look like brown spot. but are actually bacteridiseases. Fungicides won't have any activity on Second, work in Kansas would suggest that fungicides have not been economical unless significant levels of disease are present. Work by Northeast Area agronomist Stu Duncan from 2013 to 2019 showed an average yield response across five dryland site years to be

2.8 bushels per acre. The yield response across nine irrigated site years was less than half a bushel. If disease is present, this could change significantly. Only scouting can help you determine that.

Third, fungicide resistance is increasingly becoming a concern. Blanket applications in the absence of disease with little potential for disease pressure may not seem to cause too much harm, but can increase resistance under the right circumstances.

Fungicide applications to combat soybean diseases will have the best opportunity for economic gain if frequent rainfall events occur through the R5 (seed is 1/8" long in one of the four uppermost nodes on the main stem) growth stage and disease is present. Scout now to give fungicide applications the best chance to work for you.

For information on fungicide efficacy based on disease, check out this publication from Purdue online at https://www. plantpath.k-state.edu/extension/publications/BP-161-W-1.pdf.

Sorghum Foundation announces 2020 scholarship winners The National Sorghum Foundation awarded scholarships to three students for the 2020-2021 school year, totaling $4,500. The winners are Kansas State University students Reed Middleton, Josephine Gianni and Max "The National Sorghum Foundation has been honored to present scholarships to exceptional students with a passion for sorghum since the foundation's inception 20 years ago," National Sorghum Foundation chairman

Larry Lambright said. "The three students chosen to receive scholarships this year were recognized for their strong academics, outstanding leadership and service to their universities and communities." Middleton, a junior agricultural economics major, is the recipient of the 2020 Bill Kubecka Memorial Scholarship. Originally from Hermiston, Oregon, she was raised by a family with deep agricultural roots, which sparked Middleton's interest in agricultural policy as it relates to global food systems. Following graduation, Middleton

plans on pursuing a career in research and development focused on markets in low-income countries. This scholarship was renamed this year to honor the memory of Bill Kubecka-a former sorghum sector representative on the U.S. Grains Council board, and past chairman of both National Sorghum Producers and the United Sorghum Checkoff Program. Throughout his life, Kubecka remained active and engaged in the advocacy process for sorghum and U.S. sorghum producers.

The recipient of the 2020 Bruce Maunder Memorial Scholarship is Gianni from Crown Point, Indiana. Gianni is a senior food science major with plans to pursue a Ph.D. She has a strong interest in researching how sorghum and other grain crops transform throughout the milling process. Gianni plans to attain a career designing and managing feed mills across the globe with an emphasis on improving sustainability for future generations. This scholarship honors long-time sorghum industry advocate Bruce Maunder who led the sorghum foundation for 20 years and served as research adviser to the industry after retiring from a 35-plus year career as a sorghum Harman was awarded the 2020 Darrell Rosenow Memorial Scholarship. Harman, originally from Inman, is a junior double-majoring in biochemistry and global food systems. Harman served as the 2018-2019 Kansas State FFA President and has plans to pursue a Ph.D. in genetics or molecular biology. After completing his education, Harman's career aspirations are in the private sector working to improve the food system through researching novel gene editing techniques to benefit both producers and end-users. This scholarship is presented in honor of Darrell Rosenow to support the next generation of agricultural pioneers. Rosenow spent over 40 years as a sorghum plant breeder and developed a reputation as a pioneer in hybrid sorghum breeding. "The National Sorghum Foundation was extremely pleased with the high-caliber applicants for this year's scholarships," Lambright said. "We congratulate each one of these students and wish them success in their studies and future careers." Each scholarship provides students with $1,500 to assist with education expenses. The Bill Kubeka Memorial Scholarship winner, Middleton, will also have the opportunity to attend National Sorghum Producers annual D.C.

Fly-In to learn about agricultural policy and regulatory agencies impacting the U.S. sorghum industry. For more information about the National Sorghum Foundation and scholarship criteria, visit www.sorghumgrowers.com/foundation-scholarships/.

tools and genetic resources to make soybeans drought resistant is what U.S. Department of Agriculture Research Geneticist Thomas Carter, Jr. and his team do for the United Soybean Board (USB) (projecť 2020 172-0130). However, in 2020 the COVID-19 pandemic added a new disaster to the mix.

Because of the pandemic, university and USDA agricultural labs were virtually shut down, cutting off access to the big barns and automated equipment normally used to sort, count, and bag seeds for spring planting. But since planting can't wait, these researchers took seeds and packets home for more than 10,000 field plots, and filled them by hand from their dining rooms, back porches, and garages. Personal spaces were cleared, and filled with bags, boxes, counting boards and weigh scales. Paper bags containing a unique soybean geno-type must be cleaned and screened before being counted and put into an envelope. After each envelope was filled, it was stapled to prevent spillage, then placed in order in a cardboard channel box until it was time to put the envelopes in planting order.

But that was not the end. Since university sta-tions were closed, special permission had to be obtained from university chancellors and the USDA, and new planting protocols had to be devised to cope with pandemic regulations. Part of these regulations were to limit the number of personnel that could be in the field at any one time. Thus, planting was slower than normal once they got into the fields. In addition, from mid-May until the present, excessive rain forced plating in a 'piecemeal' fashion as specific fields became workable, rather than planting an entire research station at once as is normal practice. Despite pandemic, rain, and other logistical difficulties, about 80% of the drought-tolerance yield trials and related nursery materials were planted in spring 2020.

This dedicated bunch from across Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas, Iowa, Georgia, and North Carolina really went the extra mile, using the soybean breeding version of teleworking to achieve this remarkable success.

real estate value for 2020 Governor Laura Kelly visits Kansas State University Biosecurity Research Institute long history of excellence

Governor Laura Kelly toured the Kansas State University Biosecurity Research Institute (BRI) last Thursday to learn more about its work fighting the COVID-19 pandemic, including through potential vaccine development, medicine discovery, and understanding how animals may be affected by the virus.

"The Kansas State University Biosecurity Research Institute has a ADVANCE AUCTION NOTICE

what we are currently facing with COVID-19," Kelly said. "My conversations with BRI staff served as a reminder of how many of our best and brightest have answered the call to help end the pandemic. While my administration is doing everything in our power to get Kansans back to work and kids back to butions being made by our health community will be instrumental to protecting the people of this state and our economy." Kansas State University has tremendous expertise to bring against zoonotic diseases such as COVID-19," Myers said. "Our capabilities began with the production of antisera for classical swine fever in 1908 and have accelerated since. Our combined assets and expertise have earned Kansas State University the reputation of the 'Silicon Valley for biodefense."" BRI, located at Pat Roberts Hall on the Kansas State University Manhattan campus, is typically the home of comprehensive infectious disease research to address threats to plant, animal, and human health, including food-borne pathogens. The hub contains multiple biosafety level 3 labs - the second-highest level of security possible.

Since the pandemic began, the highly-trained BRI researchers and staff have applied their unique expertise to fighting the COVID-19 pandemic, just as they have with earlier epidemics such as SARS and MERS.

Lincoln, Neb., Aug. 5, 2020 -Energy is not always of any successful farm. To help get folks off on the right foot, Nebraska Extension, in partnership with Extension programs from several other states and the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA), have developed a new series of Extension materials designed specifically with new farmers in The series, "Energy Answers for the Beginning Farmer & Rancher," utilizes farm energy experts from university Extension programs across the country to answer pressing energy questions. The main product of the project is a series of short, engaging videos and resources that give useful tips and information on farm energy. "Energy is typically one of the highest ongoing costs of any farm operation," says project manager Siobhan Fathel of Penn State. "These resources act as the first step to better managing your energy costs and needs.'

In addition to the short, engaging videos, there are also links to complementary materials designed to aid beginning farmers and ranchers in making informed decisions about on-farm energy. For example, the "Online Energy Selector" developed by the project team helps farmers compare and select the heating fuel that a regular part of their diet may be better protected against viral pathogens, a new study from University of Illinois shows. The researchers attribute the effect to isoflavones, a natural compound in soybeans.

Porcine reproductive and respiratory syndrome virus (PRRSV) is a widespread disease that costs U.S. swine producers around $650 million every year. There is evidence that feeding soy helps protect pigs against the disease, but it's not clear why or how it works, says Ryan Dilger, co-author on the study and associate professor in the Department of Animal Sciences, Division of Nutritional Sciences, and Neuroscience Program at U of I.

Dilger and his collaborators previously pointed to dietary soy isoflavones as the active ingredient, and they wanted to explore that hypothesis further.

"In this study, we're looking specifically at isoflavones and whether they have a beneficial effect on the immune response," Dilger says. "We wanted to understand how we can take a primary protein source in a diet that's already used for pigs and provide a practical way for producers to combat the endemic PRRSV." Isoflavones are a flavonoid compound that occurs naturally in plants, with a particularly high concentration in soybeans. It has well-known health benefits and is used as a dietary supplement for humans, explains Brooke Smith, lead author of the study and graduate researcher in the Veterinary Medical Scholars Program ed pigs, these isoflavones seem to be supportive by either helping the pigs clear secondary infections or setting them up for a more successful immune response so they clear the infection and don't succumb to it," Smith says.

Dilger adds the research is unique in focusing on nutrition. "We are using something that's going through the gastrointestinal tract to try and alter the immune response to a virus which is actually in the lungs. So never does the virus come into direct contact with the isoflavones. These are two different systems," he says.

The study included 96 pigs, divided into three groups. Two groups were infected with PRRSV; one of these groups received a supplement of isoflavones while the other did not. A control group of non-infected pigs received a diet without isoflavones.

Infected pigs that did not consume isoflavones had about 50% higher rate of infection-related mortality than those receiving the supplement. Consequently, isoflavones in the diet could have a significant economic effect for producers, the researchers conclude.

In a second part of the study the researchers looked more specifically at whether isoflavones might benefit the immune system indirectly by changing profiles of bacteria in the large intestine of the pig.

"We did not know whether there was a direct effect of isoflavones on the immune system or whether it was a result of isoflavones benefitting resident bacteria, which then had an indirect effect on the host," Smith says.

They were able to rule isoflavones through bacteria. However, even though the researchers were not able to explain the biological mechanisms, it is clear isoflavones are beneficial.

Soybean is usually a part of pig diets, and the researchers recommend producers keep it that way. They say more studies are needed to determine the ideal amount for optimal

While isoflavones have a wide variety of anti-inflammatory and anti-oxidative cell activities, they also have estrogen-like components that can affect breeding females and change the reproductive cycle. Swine producers need to balance anti-viral effects with estrogen activity when determining the isoflavone level in diets

The researchers point out that their findings can also have implications for human health. The inspiration for their study came from research in humans that looked at antiviral properties of isoflavones.

"We've brought the human context into the the scenario of production agriculture. We learned something that may benefit swine producers, but certainly it goes back in the other direction as well, to potentially help with human health," Dilger explains.

The first study, "Dietary soy isoflavones reduce pathogen-related mortality in growing pigs under porcine reproductive and respiratory syndrome viral challenge," is published in the Journal of Animal Science. [https://doi. org/10.1093/jas/skaa024]

Authors include Brooke Smith, Ryan Dilger, Maci Oelschlager, and hammed Shameer Abdul Rasheed, Department of Animal Sciences and Division of Nutrition Sciences, University of Illinois.

The second study, "Alterations of fecal microbiome characteristics by dietary soy isoflavone ingestion in growing pigs infected with porcine reproductive and respiratory syndrome virus," is also published in the Journal of Animal Science. [https://doi. org/10.1093/jas/skaa156]

Year-round cattle marketing yields results

Cattle producers who work year-round to set their animals up for success — through nutrition management, for example strive for the best possible outcome. The same is true when it comes to marketing

The American Hereford Association is equipping members with knowledge and tools they need to be impactful marketers in all market conditions. Mark Johnson, Hereford breeder and livestock marketing agent, shared advice during The Brand Marketing Summit last fall. Step one, he says, is knowing your operation and what sets it apart. "One important thing is trying to define who you are as an organization,"

Johnson says. "What are your strengths, and once you identify that, how to tell people about it." Each operation runs differently. Finding and employing the best marketing strategies can change the way an operation performs in a very competitive industry.

"There is never 'one size fits all,' in my opinion, and there are so many different segments within the Hereford industry on how you can market cattle," says Jason Barber of Superior Livestock. "Some people can sell horned and polled bulls for a lot of money and volume. Some people have just a handful of cows and they need to market some calves or some show heifers. Just try to offer (your customers) a marketing product that might fit their business models and help them on sale day."

Building relationships, providing top-quality customer service and keeping the genetic program top-of-mind should all be year-round goals for today's seedstock producer - along with seeking marketing support.

effort "Consistent yields consistent results, in my opinion," Barber says. "There's all kinds of ways to promote sales and there's a lot of people that are professionals in this industry that've dedicated their lives and their professionalism to help other people be successful."

At the end of the day, it's about relationships.

"No matter what you are marketing — whether it is fed cattle or feeder cattle or purebred livestock or whatever widget you might be selling when you're working with someone, just treat them fairly," Johnson says. "Develop relationships that you can fall back on when times get tough. If you have a strong brand, you can have a few setbacks and people will still rally around you rather than just focusing on your product."

The American Hereford Association provides a variety of year-round marketing opportunities and resources for marketing beef cattle genetics. For more information

Producers should give pigs priority when temperatures soar

As temperatures inch upward, it's not uncommon to hear rural folks say they are "sweating like a pig."

But pigs can't sweat, says University of Missouri Extension swine nutritionist Marcia Shannon. Pigs would probably think they are in hog heaven if they could cool themselves by perspiring like other livestock and humans.

Producers should give pigs priority when temperatures soar, says Shannon. Pigs have few working sweat glands to remove body heat and rely on their caretakers for heat relief.

Heat stress can happen quickly in pigs over 100 pounds when temperatures exceed 80 F and relative humidity is above 50%.

Shannon offers ways to improve pig comfort:

- · Feed during morning or late evening hours when there is less severe sunlight and heat.
 - · Provide a constant supply of fresh drinking water at room temperature or lower. Water flow should be at least one gallon per minute for sows with litters and 0.5-0.6 gallons per minute for finishing pigs.

- Use a hose or sprinkler to run cool water over the pigs' skin. Let skin dry before wetting again.
- Shade and mud holes provide relief to outside pigs. When pigs roll in mud, the mud cools and coats their skin to prevent sunburn.
- Move overheated pigs away from other pigs. Wet their skin with cool but not ice-cold water. Let them dry. Repeat as needed. Pigs will lie in cool areas and seek space away from other pigs when hot. They also move less.

- · Watch for stressed breathing patterns or panting, one of the first signs of heat stress. More than 50 breaths per minute indicates stress.
- Eating and digestion generate heat, so pigs eat less when it's hot to control their internal body temperature. Add more fat to rations. This reduces heat increment and boosts energy. When doing so, increase protein in diets and add cool water to feed to stimulate intake.

High temperatures affect pigs in other ways. Heat stress reduces semen production in boars, and pigs breed less, resulting in lower conception rates. Confinement operators also can take simple steps to reduce heat, says Joe Zulovich, MU Extension agricultural engineer. First, clean building fans with brooms or power washers. Dirty exhaust fan systems can reduce airflow by half. Inside temperatures should be no more than three to five degrees higher than outside temperatures when the ventilation is adequate. If not, check and clean fans, grilles and shutters, and call a ventilation system
